1. Executive Summary

What is the bottom line?

This research and report were commissioned by the Veterans' Advisory Board to gauge if New Zealand's public has the appetite to establish a Kawenata between the Government and New Zealanders to recognise service people and their families better. Research First found that while the public is generally unfamiliar with the lives of service people and their families, and with what a Kawenata is, New Zealanders are overall in favour of supporting and recognising service people and their families through a Kawenata.

What did we find?

This quantitative research was a follow up to qualitative research that we performed with New Zealanders on the same topic in March 2020. In this quantitative research, we were able to engage a representative cross-section of New Zealanders across various demographic characteristics.

Our quantitative findings were consistent with the qualitative in that the general public has low levels of understanding of what service people do, their lives, and what forms of support are available to them. However, despite this, most people responded positively to the idea of doing more to recognise and support current and former service people, whom the public believes are mostly engaged in overseas missions and civil defence.

The desire for more support is borne out of a sense of moral obligation to the people serving in the New Zealand Defence Force. In terms of what that support and recognition should look like, the top priorities include mental and physical health, reintegration into civilian life, support for families, support for organisations like the RSA, and overall financial support.

What about the Kawenata?

Most New Zealanders see value in having a Kawenata for New Zealand, despite their limited understanding of what the term means, and what it might include. In terms of what the Kawenata should do, the public views it as a tool to provide greater support to service people, greater certainty in life, and greater recognition of their contributions. Those supporting a Kawenata list the same priorities, with mental and physical health support remaining prominent.

What is the Research First take?

Looking at the overall findings (qualitative and quantitative), we find that achieving wider public buy-in for a Kawenata could be helped along by increasing awareness about the lives of service people and their families. We also see benefits around bringing the public along on the Kawenata journey by increasing the visibility of the military and its purpose and explaining why New Zealanders need to do more for service people. Armed with this knowledge, we think it will be easier for the general public to understand (i) what a Kawenata is/represents and (ii) what the role/responsibility of New Zealanders will be under such a Kawenata. This, in turn, should translate into more people taking a definitive and more informed stance on the question of whether or not they support a Kawenata.

2. Background

Context

The Veterans' Advisory Board (VAB) is an independent statutory board providing advice directly to the Minister for Veterans. In 2019, the VAB completed a review which assessed who qualified as a veteran and how the Government could reward an individual's service. From this and prior work around the wellbeing of current and ex-service members, the key recommendations included:

- i. Stipulating a definition of a veteran as encompassing all those who have served.
- ii. Establishing a Covenant/Kawenata between service people, the Government, and New Zealanders.

Subsequently, the Veterans' Advisory Board embarked on a process of hearing from a representative cross-section of New Zealanders to understand how service people, and their families, are viewed in New Zealand, to gauge the appetite for a military Kawenata in the future.

Objectives

To that end, the Veterans' Advisory Board through Allen + Clarke contracted Research First to engage a diverse mix of New Zealanders to address the following research objective:

To understand the public appetite for establishing a Kawenata between the Government and the people of New Zealand to recognise service people and their families better.

Method

To engage the public, Research First followed up an initial qualitative stage, with quantitative stage using computer-assisted telephone interviews (telephone surveys). We surveyed a broad cross-section of New Zealanders (n=776) based on criteria such as their gender, age, residency status (by birth/naturalisation), location, ethnicity, and proximity to current or ex-service personnel. These splits are detailed further in this report. The fieldwork commenced on 12 May 2020 and ended on 4 June 2020.

A p-value of <0.05 was considered to be statistically significant. The arrows in the tables indicate statistically significant differences between the associated group and the remainder of the population.

3. Demographics

Key points to note around demographics include:

- ✓ We achieved a gender balance consistent with the 2018 census, which reflects a relatively balanced split between males and females in New Zealand.
- ✓ Across the surveyed regions, our survey sample matched the national (census) percentages of people aged 16 years and over in each region.
- ✓ There was a good mix of rural and urban respondents, noting that around 13.5%<sup>1</sup> of New Zealanders live in rural areas. In our survey, the sample responses had a 25% representation of rural New Zealanders, based on self-identification.
- ✓ The distribution of respondents across different ethnicities was consistent with census data.
- ✓ There was an almost even split in respondents' proximity to a service person. That is, 51% either were a current/ex-service member, had a service member in their family or knew someone (unrelated) who was a service person. Meanwhile, the other half had no proximity to service people.
- ✓ Of those people with a service person in their family, their relationship was most likely to be a parent.

4. Awareness of and attitudes towards the military

We surveyed all respondents to gauge their awareness and attitudes towards the military and service people in general.

- ✓ New Zealanders feel there is a moral obligation for the country to support service people and their families, even though the public has low levels of knowledge about service people and their lives.
- ✓ We found significant differences between young people, aged 16–29 years, and the rest of the sample.
- ✓ Other significant differences in the population between young people and other age groups were that more young people than expected agreed that New Zealand does a good job of supporting service people and their families.
- ✓ Meanwhile, there were significantly fewer respondents aged 30–59 years who agreed that New Zealand does a good job of supporting service people and their families compared to the other age groups.

Perceptions of Service People

Q8. Now, I'd like to ask a few questions about military service people and their families. That is people that have served or are currently serving in the New Zealand Defence Force, including, the Navy, Army and Airforce and their families. This does not include the Civil Defense staff. Using a scale from 1 to 5, where 1 is strongly disagree, 2 is disagree, 3 is neither agree nor disagree, 4 is agree, and 5 is strongly agree, how much do you agree or disagree with the following statements? Base: All respondents (n=776).

Note: The question included a 'don't know' response option which was not read out by the interviewer.

Perception of Activities of Service People

New Zealanders see the primary role of service people as undertaking overseas missions and civil defence operations. There were notable differences between the different subgroups across the key demographic criteria evaluated.

- ✓ Proximity to a service person: Respondents who 'knew someone that was a service person (but unrelated) were more likely than the rest of the population to view service people as being engaged in overseas missions, civil defence/emergency response, activities in New Zealand, and maritime patrol. Meanwhile, respondents with no proximity to service people were less likely to share this opinion but were more likely not to be able to identify an activity.
- ✓ Age group: There was a significant difference between the proportion of respondents that viewed service people as being engaged in overseas missions and civil defence/emergency response among people aged 30-59 years compared to the other age groups.
- ✓ Ethnicity: There were significant differences in the population between the proportion of New Zealand Europeans who viewed the role of service people as being engaged in overseas missions and civil defence/emergency response operations as compared to other ethnicities. Among New Zealand Europeans, the proportion of people who thought service people engaged in the above activities was higher than expected.

The proportion of respondents identifying as Māori and Pasifika who could not think of anything that service people did was significantly higher than expected.

Activities of Service People

Q9. What kind of things or activities do you think service people do for New Zealand? Base: All respondents (n=776).

Note: This question did not have scripted responses which were read out. Instead, respondents were free to answer as they chose, with their comments subsequently coded into the pre-determined categories represented in the chart. 'Defence/ keep our borders safe/ protect our borders', 'Training' and 'War/Combat' were not pre-coded responses hence the figures in the chart represent completely free association on the part of respondents.

Belief In More Recognition and Support

The survey also assayed public appetite for more to be done in support and recognition of service people and their families. We found that:

- ✓ The majority of New Zealanders (2 in 3 people) believe that service people and their families should receive more recognition and support.
- ✓ People mainly felt that the different consequences of deployment, such as separation from their families and putting their lives on the line, were some of the main reasons that service people needed more support, in addition to being inadequately recognised for their service.
- ✓ Among those who felt no additional recognition or support was required, their key reasons were that service people already had adequate support and recognition, and that they were being paid to do the job.
- ✓ Meanwhile, New Zealanders who felt the need for more support endorsed almost all forms of tangible support, specifically around mental and physical health, reintegration into civilian life, support for families, support for organisations like the RSA, and overall financial support.

Q10a. Why do you think they should receive more recognition and support? Base: Believers in more support and recognition (n=538)

Some of the responses included:

"You send them away to war and then spit on them when they come home. Which is what they did in Vietnam"---Former service person.

"They work in very difficult conditions, i.e., they are kept away from their families for long periods of time, and they are posted to all sorts of odd and unpredictable places, and they have to do a lot of odd and unpredictable things. They often are put in situations like they have to go underwater and up mountains and they are given the greasy end of the stick, after saying all this they actually sort of get looked after, like they get a lot of resources thrown at them. i.e., good machines top-notch machinery military and army any of the services get access to really good gear, i.e., vehicles"---Family member is a current or former service person.

"They see some horrible things where they go, and it can change you as a person and how they react with their families and how they view the world around them, which can deeply affect their future in work or anything that they do"--- No proximity to a service person.

"You're giving up your life for the military even though it's a choice. Where you live and move around the country is not your choice"---Former service person.

"To be honest, I feel like families in the service are not widely acknowledged. They might lose the service people when they are away on training or whatever so they should be recognised more"--- No proximity to a service person.

Q10b. Why do you think they should not receive more recognition and support? Base: Respondents against more support and recognition (n=70)

Some of the responses included:

"I think it is a career and a paid job, just like any other job. We are more peacekeeping in NZ than actually on the front line. People know what they are signing up for, and that is probably the reason why they sign up for it. Perhaps the incentive is they are drawn by the travel, but when they pick up a gun, it is probably not quite what they thought it would be. And there are other careers that make sacrifices such as missing family life or being away from family for a long time."--- Family member is a current or former service person.

"They are public servants and should receive no more or no less recognition than any other public servants. Which includes other groups of public servants such as police or nurses."--- Knows someone who is a current or former service person (unrelated).

*"I think they choose to do a job, and it's a job or career they've chosen, so why should they get more recognition than anybody else. It's all voluntary."---*No proximity to a service person

Support for Committing to Service People and their Families

Of the n=539 people (who believe in more support and recognition) that were asked if there should be “something in place” that commits to recognise and support service people and their families, the majority (82%) said yes. This effectively equates to support of 57% when considering the entire survey sample of n=776.

5. Introducing the Kawenata

After we had described the outline of the Kawenata to respondents, we explored whether there is a public appetite for establishing a Kawenata between the Government and the people of New Zealand to recognise service people and their families better. Key findings include:

- ✓ More than half of respondents showed support for a Kawenata.
- ✓ At a subgroup level, there were differences in the proportion of 'yes' responses among respondents who had no proximity to a service person compared to respondents with some level of proximity. Among respondents with no proximity, the proportion of 'yes' responses was significantly lower than expected.
- ✓ Moreover, among people with no proximity to a service person, the proportion of people that did not know whether they supported a Kawenata was significantly higher than the average.
- ✓ Interestingly, the proportion of service people that did not support a Kawenata was significantly higher than expected compared to other respondents who responded 'no'.
- ✓ There was a similar level of support for the Kawenata between urban and rural populations.
- ✓ Generally, there was broad consensus around what the benefits of a Kawenata should be, with support, minimising uncertainty, and recognition attaining high levels of importance.
- ✓ However, there were significant differences between respondents aged 30-59 years and the other age groups around the Kawenata creating clarity around the responsibility of New Zealanders.

Q14. What do you think the overall benefits of a Kawenata could be? Base: n=590.

Some of the responses included:

“They should be entitled to government-funded healthcare and rehabilitation for injuries sustained in combat, not just physical injuries but mental injuries as well”--- Former service person.

“To provide greater support for the families, especially when someone returns home”--- No proximity to a service person.

“To ensure adequate financial support for service people that have been disadvantaged, whether that be mental, financial, or socially”--- No proximity to a service person.

“They should make sure they don't fall through the cracks like they do in the United States, where veterans come home, and they are homeless. We should not have that”--- No proximity to a service person.

“Just being able to plan ahead for things and know that you can always have support, and it can't be encroached upon because it's a contract, so it will be there forever”--- No proximity to a service person.

“Knowing that New Zealand supports them and gives them the recognition that they deserve. Knowing that New Zealand is behind them.”---Family member is a current or former service person.

6. Components of a Kawenata

Building on the narrative of public support for establishing a Kawenata, we also looked at what the Kawenata should include or do for the families of service people, in the eyes of the public. Consistent with the qualitative findings, many of the responses revolved around explicit forms of support. Specifically, we note that:

- ✓ Overwhelmingly people want the Kawenata to ‘have teeth’, with the majority of respondents expressing that there should be explicit forms of support and recognition in place for the families of service people.
- ✓ In terms of what the Kawenata should provide the families, supporters of the Kawenata prioritised the provision of tangible support primarily around support for families, mental health support, financial support, and support in general.

However, one in four respondents, although they supported the Kawenata, did not know what the Kawenata should include for the families of service people.

It should also be noted that although the question was explicitly asked about what a Kawenata should include for families, responses indicated that respondents interpreted the question more generally about what a Kawenata should include for service people and their families.

Q15. What do you think a Kawenata should include or do for the families of service people? Base: Supporters of a Kawenata (n=590).

Note: The question included a don't know option.

Some of the responses specific to families included:

"You could have a get-together or a gathering or a suggestion box about more assistance and real-life feedback - you can't get any better than that - it allows the families the opportunity to be heard - financial, family support and the mental side of things - what that journey is like - employing more staff for mental health"---Family member is a current or former service person.

"To make sure that they are not at a loss if they lose the person in their family that is a service person, so they are insured for their loss. And to cover any mental and health issues to do with their work for the service person and the family. And to make sure there is a proper pension plan in place after time served, something to go on to afterward"--- Knows someone who is a current or former service person (unrelated).

"To help the families. To give education to the kids. To help them go through life and study, then they can find work"---No proximity to a service person.

"To ensure that families and individuals are looked after in case of need, be it physical or mental"---No proximity to a service person.

"Support the families in case something happens. Some other services go on Defence are single and some married. Something in place to help the families"---No proximity to a service person.

"Provide them with support for their families and themselves. For during their service, and transitioning back into society"---Family member is a current or former service person.

"It must also include the children of servicemen even when they age. My parents split up, and so my mother and the other kids were left almost homeless. Even though we were affected by the military, we did not get any compensation or support. Even though my father was a good soldier, he ended up messed up because of his experiences serving in Malaya, which affected me and the rest of the family"--- Family member is a current or former service person.

Components of a Uniquely New Zealand Kawenata

- ✓ One in two respondents did not know what a uniquely New Zealand Kawenata should look like.
- ✓ Among New Zealanders of ethnicities other than New Zealand European, the proportion of people who valued cultural aspects was higher.
- ✓ The majority of the population remains unclear on what other issues should be addressed around the Kawenata. Meanwhile, of those who gave a response, most thought that the Kawenata was a good idea

APPENDIX 1: QUESTIONNAIRE

Introduction

Good morning, my name is <<name>> from an independent market research company called Research First. I'm calling about research we're currently conducting for the Veterans Advisory Board, which provides advice to the Government on the wellbeing of people that serve or have served in New Zealand's Defence Forces and their families.

Is now a good time to talk? If no, find a time to call back.

We don't expect you to have prior knowledge of this topic but want you to have your say as a New Zealander.

The Veteran's Advisory Board wants to understand your views and expectations around recognising people in the military and their families by inviting you to a short 15-minute survey.

Would you like to participate in this survey?

Refusal – thank all people who refuse to take the time to talk to you and tell them to have a nice day/afternoon.

If necessary:

Please know that Research First is a professional market research company, so we abide by a Code of Practice. This means we treat everything you tell us as totally confidential. You have the right to decline or withdraw from the research at any time. Our Freephone number is 0800101275.

Introducing a Kawenata

Introduction to the concept of a Kawenata.

One way that New Zealand could express its support and recognition of service people and their families is through an agreement or 'Kawenata' between service people and their families, the Government, and the people of New Zealand. That way we can better recognise service people's contributions to our country and make sure their service does not disadvantage them.

This Kawenata would mean a written promise or agreement that binds the parties in a permanent relationship, like a pact.

Outro Statements

Completed Survey

Thank you for taking the time to answer this survey. All responses will be collated with others to provide information in a report to the Minister for Veterans. The report will describe the approach taken to seeking New Zealanders' views on a Kawenata and what we found out. It will also recommend possible next steps.

Just to remind you my name is *** from Research First. Thank you very much for speaking to us today.

If necessary: Our website is www.researchfirst.co.nz or you can call 0800 101 275 if you have more questions about the survey.

Screen Out

I'm sorry, this survey is only open to New Zealand citizens, and New Zealand residents, aged 16 and over.

Quota Full

Unfortunately, we can't include you in the phone survey this time. We have to ensure we speak to a representative cross-section of the population, and we have already spoken to many people that match your profile.
